The High School of Hobart Town was completed in 1850 to the designs of architect Alexander Dawson. It became the home of the University of Tasmania in 1892, and was subsequently home to a variety of Tasmanian educational institutions. It became known as Domain House in the 1970s. This illustrated history of the life and times of Domain House, and of its conservation by the University of Tasmania, has been prepared as a commemoration of the one hundred and twenty fifth anniversary of the founding of the University in 1890. The publication also celebrates the completion of the Domain House restoration and reconstruction project, which first commenced late in 2012.

Three architects with differing backgrounds, but a shared appreciation of Tasmanian architectural history and practice, have come together to provide a unique combination of skills and resources to address the many complex issues in the conservation of Domain House, and to prepare this illustrated history. Peter Freeman managed the publication about the history of this iconic Tasmanian building and the conservation project initiated by the University of Tasmania.
