The repatriation of Ancestral Remains is a highly significant Indigenous achievement and inter-cultural development of the past 40 years. Participants will explore the practice, history, meaning and significance of repatriation for Indigenous peoples, museums and broader society.

This course is co-developed and delivered by repatriation researchers and practitioners involved in the Return, Reconcile, Renew research group, including at: the Australian National University, University of Technology Sydney, University of Melbourne, Kimberley Aboriginal Law and Culture Centre, Ngarrindjeri Regional Authority, Gur a Baradharaw Kod Torres Strait Sea and Land Council, the National Museum of Australia, and the Museum of New Zealand Te Papa Tongarewa.

This 5-day intensive Professional Development (PD) course will be taught online in 2020. The course is also offered through the Australian National University as a post-graduate Masters course. A micro-credential for the PD course is in development (check with convenor for details)

The course is designed for those interested and engaged in repatriation practice, research and policy-making, for example in community, museum, university and government sectors.

It focusses on the skills for successful repatriation practice—how to locate and return Ancestral Remains; the history of how, when, why Ancestral Remains were taken and the Indigenous response; the connection of repatriation to Indigenous law, culture, ethics, Country and community development; institutional, agency and government policy regimes; repatriation and its international context.

Presenters

National and international repatriation experts from community organisations, museums and research institutions, many of whom are part of the Return Reconcile Renew research network (see www.returnreconcilerenew.info)
